

THE INSTITUTE ON LAW, RELIGION, AND ETHICS

This Institute provides students, faculty, and lawyers the opportunity to explore the nexus between law, religion, and ethics. We hope to draw from a broad range of religious and legal voices seeking dialogue and common ground. The Institute serves as an umbrella organization for many law and religion-related activities that have developed at Pepperdine Law School over the years. Current initiatives include a Juris Doctor/Master of Divinity joint degree, which will begin this fall. An innovative curriculum includes courses on religious faith, ethical challenges, and the practice of law. Other endeavors include our Union Rescue Mission legal clinic, serving the legal needs of the homeless of Los Angeles, and international human rights studies and research. This new Institute will also complement the work of the Straus Institute for Dispute Resolution, which has a special emphasis on religion and dispute resolution.

This conference was made possible by a grant from the Pepperdine Voyage, a Lilly Endowment-funded project on the theological exploration of vocation, administered by the Pepperdine University Center for Faith and Learning.

Surveys of lawyers find that they are generally unhappy people.

Many lawyers at the top of their careers are asking, “Is this all there is?”

A very high percentage would choose another profession if they had it to do over.

Can religious faith, particularly the faith of Christians and Jews, provide meaning for the practice of law?

This conference will focus on the religious concept of vocation or calling as a means of understanding the ordinary, day-to-day work of lawyers. For some, religious faith and law practice have nothing to do with one another; these lawyers live a morally schizophrenic life, with one set of values at work, and another set at home and religious congregation. For others, religion and work are completely at odds with one another. As one lawyer said, “My work at church is designed to make up for what I do during the rest of the week.”

Three of the leading thinkers in the country on the relationship between religious faith and secular work will speak. Each has argued that work, even what is normally considered secular work, is an area of life that can and should be redeemed by God. Next will be a discussion of how the theory of vocation or calling might apply to lawyers—to the problems (and opportunities?) created by the adversary system, billing pressures, stress, and lack of collegiality within the profession. Individual panels composed of some of the leading lawyers and law professors in the country will focus on specialty areas—corporate, family, civil litigation, and criminal prosecution and defense—and whether the concepts suggested by the keynote speakers are helpful in their areas of practice.

A Note to Our Jewish Colleagues—In consultation with Pepperdine law professor Rabbi Samuel Levine, we have addressed special concerns of our Jewish colleagues. On Saturday, philosophical/religious discussions that Rabbi Levine believes are appropriate for the Sabbath are scheduled. Pepperdine Law School is located one-and-a-half miles from hotel accommodations that are within a few blocks of Reform and Orthodox worship centers (Malibu Beach Inn and Casa Malibu). The on-campus Pepperdine Conference Center housing is one-quarter mile from a Reconstructionist synagogue. Kosher meals will be available at all conference events. Rabbi Levine can be reached at 310.506.6892 or Samuel.Levine@pepperdine.edu.
